Magnetic-resonance-imaging studies of horizontal eye movements were performed in several normal subjects using a TROLL-MR system. Spin images of the eyes were acquired during horizontal saccadic and smooth pursuit and during rightward saccades, in response to stimuli moving in the left or right direction. Correlations between the traces derived from the saccadic and smooth-pursuit tasks were weak. In contrast, eye and head rotations were highly correlated for rightward saccades to stimuli moving in the left and right directions. These correlations were independent of eye position in the orbit and, as in similar studies of smooth pursuit, were not observed when the subject's head was rotated. Such correlations are attributed to a combination of direct interneural and indirect intramuscular inputs to the eye muscles.

It also won't tell you what the searchers

But it's still early." She is one of the Palestinian youths occupying public buildings, including police stations, in occupied East Jerusalem. The occupation has been ongoing for over 30 years and in Israel she is labeled a terrorist for her part in it. But for about a decade she has been one of the leaders of the Palestinian youth wing of Fatah, the dominant political party in the West Bank. Like most Palestinians, Maria is impatient for something to happen; she's sick of the cycle of violence that has plagues the region since the end of the Ottoman empire a hundred years ago. She feels that violence solves nothing. And that the Palestinians need to build and develop their society. "I don't want the revolution to end without real, just and lasting progress on the political level in Palestine," she says. Last week, she and her fellow protestors held a sit-in at the entrance to Jerusalem's police headquarters. The occupation began in 1967 when Israel occupied the West Bank and East Jerusalem, areas Israel claims are part of its "indivisible" religious-national entity, Judea and Samaria.
